MISCELLANEOUS READING. THE CANDIDATE-To suit the TIMES. A worthy cit, whose name was Brown, Bethought himself one day. That every lane must have its turn, And every dog his day. So to himself at once he said, Methinks I'll try my fate.

Ha! ha!, he laughed, Brown stock shall rise, I will raise a public clamour, When B-R-O-W-N, Shall grace a mammoth banner.

I'll be a candidate.

My name shall be in every eye, And every tongue shall speak it, And fame herself shall burst her cheeks, As through her trump she'll squeak it.

He told his wife, and from her face, Quick vanished every frown, She smiled that soon she'd certain be The hon'ble "Mrs. Brown." The little Browns all ceased their play, And said that they expected

No longer petticoats to wear, But pants, when "PA'S." elected. So Mr. Brown, he went at once, To the sovereigns of the nation, And soon persuaded them that he, Should have the nomination. And quick his name on every wall, On fence, on post, through town,

In mammoth capitals was seen, 'Till all was Brown! Brown!! Brown!!! This made Brown happy, but "alas, Who can control his fate"-He'd yet to learn the trials of one Who is a candidate. Reports were soon abroad that he Had ta'en what wasn't his'en,

And that at one time of his life. He'd spent some years in prison. One party swore, his marriage bed Had ne'er been blessed by parson, Another one could easy prove He'd once committed arson. A fourth knew him a murderer, This raised at once a bobbery.

A fifth could swear, that he, besides, Had done a highway robbery. The natives swore that he was born In Ireland's isle so green, While others said in Hindostan. The light he first had seen. Adopted cits, quite the reverse. A "Know Nothing" him did call,

And one man bet that he could prove He wasn't born at all! Brown bore it well, but 'twas no use, He fell beneath these shocks, He couldn't steer his bark at all, Among so many tocks So beaten, drove half mad with rage,

He hung himself at sun-dow Lett Mrs. B. a widow, and Was regularly done Brown! DON JOHN. February 22, 1858.
